Being able to determine deceptive responses through the observation of nonverbal clues and body reactions during an interview or interrogation can be a valuable tool for the perceptive investigator.

During stressful interviews, individuals often “leak” autonomic behaviors that are difficult to control. This seminar presents instruction and demonstrations that teach students skills in reading behavioral signals of tempo, posture, breathing, gestures, & other body movements that cannot be consciously controlled. The class provides students with information that should enhance their perceptual skills, thus, increasing their ability to recognize changes in behavior that often forecasts shifts in attitude and imminent disclosures, as well as, to assess deception and resistance.

This is not a boring lecture seminar where participants are forced to take copious notes with minimal involvement. Rather, the program is conducted in a highly reactive setting, prompting dialog between the students and the instructor. Students are involved in numerous exercises in order to apply the techniques presented during instruction. This twenty-four hour course is only approved for Mandatory Retraining.

Objectives:

By the close of this class students should understand:

- How messages are transmitted through nonverbal as well as verbal means
- Body reactions often mean more than just what is seen
- Methods of overcoming suspect resistance during interview
- Changes in behavior often forecast shifts in attitudes on behalf of the person being interviewed
- How to become more adept in the assessing of deception
- Limitations of body language as cues to deceptions or indications of honesty

High:

- Skills required of the interviewer
- Importance of rapport building
- Need to overcome mental barriers that inhibit effective listening
- Nonverbal communication in the total interview/interrogation process
- Physiological basis of communication
